How You Can Future-Proof The Career In An AI World

Richard Lobo

In a world shaped by accelerating technological advances, evolving economic dynamics, and fluid workforce expectations, the traditional idea of a "secure career" is being fundamentally redefined. Gone are the days when a degree and a well-trodden career path guaranteed long-term success. Today, the only certainty is change and the ability to adapt to it.

As artificial intelligence (AI), automation, and intelligent systems become more integrated into enterprise workflows, both organisations and individuals are being prompted to reconsider how work is performed, who performs it, and what skills are required.

Adaptability over experience

As skills are evolving faster than job descriptions can keep up, the value of experience is being reframed. Rather than relying solely on past roles or years of service, organisations are shifting toward hiring and nurturing talent based on adaptability, cognitive agility, and the willingness to learn. This change requires HR to redefine traditional performance and hiring metrics. The workforce of tomorrow will be less about predefined roles and more about evolving capabilities, interdisciplinary thinking, and the ability to wear multiple hats in fluid work environments.

From digital literacy to AI fluency

The next frontier in digital transformation journey is AI fluency—not just understanding what AI is, but also knowing how to work with it, leverage its capabilities, and oversee its decisions. This doesn't mean we need to turn every employee into a data scientist. Instead, it involves establishing a baseline understanding of AI's capabilities, risks, and limitations across all functions, including marketing, HR, finance, and operations. The days of "one-size-fits-all" training programmes are fading; employees expect and deserve just-in-time, role-specific upskilling paths tailored to their unique career trajectories.

Building human-centric capabilities in the age of machines

As machines continue to evolve, the demand for human skills is increasing. Creativity, emotional intelligence, empathy, critical thinking, and ethical judgment remain uniquely human qualities and are becoming more valuable than ever. The goal is not to compete with AI but to complement it by leveraging the strengths that only algorithms can replicate. In essence, the future of work belongs to those who master the intersection of AI and HR—emotional intelligence.

Rethinking roles in the agentic AI era

Agentic AI — systems that can act autonomously to achieve objectives and continuously learn — are already shaping how work is orchestrated. This shift demands a fresh look at role design. Repetitive tasks will increasingly be delegated to intelligent agents, while human roles will pivot toward strategy, oversight, and creativity. Rather than resisting this change, organisations must proactively guide employees through it. This transformation is not about replacement, it's about elevation. As machines handle the mundane, humans can focus on higher-order contributions that drive innovation and value.

Creating psychological safety for change

All the upskilling, digital tools, and AI strategies in the world will fall flat without the right culture to support them. At the heart of any transformation is the need for psychological safety: a workplace where employees feel safe to experiment, voice concerns, ask questions, and fail without fear of judgment. Transparent communication, inclusive leadership, and empathetic policies are foundational. As change becomes constant, the ability to foster resilience, emotional well-being, and trust across the workforce becomes a strategic imperative.

Designing a career-ready future

In today's evolving business landscape, the idea of "future-proofing" a career is not about predicting the next big trend but about preparing for change. The responsibility doesn't lie with employees alone. It is a shared journey where organisations act as enablers, guides, and boundary-makers and breakers.

New Leader's Playbook: Be Natural, Set Strong Work Ethics

The first 100 days of a new leader are critical. The board & employees watch him with scrutinising eyes. And, initial impressions determine his acceptance, respect and freedom to perform...

By N Sarosh

Mumbai: In today's competitive business scenario, the appointment of a new leader as a CEO is a moment of high strategic significance. It can set the firm on a path to renewal or hasten its decline. Unsurprisingly, the board watches the incoming leader with a scrutinising eye — so do the employees. The first 100 days are critical, where the initial impressions are made about the leader, which determine his acceptance, respect and eventually, freedom to perform.

A test of strategic acumen

The opening engagement with senior executives offers an early glimpse into the chief's leadership style. Standard onboarding routine: tours of company outposts, meetings with divisional heads, and a half-day session with the board — serves as a primer. But the real scrutiny begins when the new chief convenes the first meeting with direct reports.

This is where the leader must strike a balance: offering a concise reflection on the onboarding experience while demonstrating an acute grasp of the company's strategic imperatives. The best approach? Listen more than speak. At this stage, it is better to be branded dull than reckless. Intense and a neat summary of strategic priorities spanning markets, products, cost control, systems improvement, hiring agenda.

Intellectual Engagement

As the second and third months unfold, the CEO shifts focus to deeper interactions with functional heads, assessing critical projects and their progress. This is when questions get sharper. Is the CEO merely ticking boxes, or actively engaging in problem-solving? Does leadership stem from experience and decisive action, or is it limited to reviewing progress? A CEO who is seen as intellectually engaged, meritocratic, and quick to grasp and recall key details earns credibility. Establishing this image in the initial months sets the tone for effective leadership.

The Board is Watching, Too

While employees assess how approachable the new CEO is, the board has a different focus: Has the CEO fully immersed in the business? Is decisive action being taken on pressing issues? The director overseeing the company will start meeting calls within a month, gradually shifting the conversation toward upcoming quarterly results. The CEO cannot escape the hard truth. Improving financial performance is the ultimate measure of success.

By the time these board check-ins begin — typically 30 to 60 days after joining — the CEO must have a firm grasp of financial and operational metrics. Expect detailed questions. What happened to that key customer order? Where is the inventory stuck? How are collections progressing? What's the latest on product performance and customer complaints? Being prepared at this level of granularity is non-negotiable.

Decisiveness and Work Ethic

The quarter a CEO makes calls on hiring, spending, and strategic bets, the faster results follow. Even if the outcome takes time, the pace of decision-making shapes the conformance hallmarks boss. The corporate grapevine tracks key customer orders, inventory speeds fast, and can either bolster or undermine leadership. Swift, well-reasoned decisions signal competence and intent.

Work intensity is another key test. Staying late reassures the board, a strict 9-to-5 routine earns scepticism. The reality should lie somewhere in between, with a focus on productive hours. The best approach? Stay natural, avoid distractions, and set a standard of strong work ethics.

Purpose And Reasoning Drive Gen Z's Career Decisions

"Think about your job from a long-term perspective": What used to be a standard career strategy until a few years ago has become irrelevant to millennials and Gen Z. Having witnessed the pandemic and its aftermath, they are differently wired and set to change the rules and methods of building their careers

By K Sudarshan

Youngsters are hungry, fast paced, and ready to give up their jobs if they do not fulfil their desire for meaning and purpose. In addition, career options are becoming easier with time. This means that their career decisions are not driven by 'thinking long term'. Here are a few factors that differentiate career choices for this talent pool:

Purpose and reasoning:

Today's talent pool is driven by the larger picture and is constantly challenging the status quo to understand the purpose and reasoning. Organisation's need to be transparent and honest in communicating the 'mission and expectations.

Experience economy: Increasingly talent of today is looking to explore newer boundaries, gain global experiences, exposure to newer roles and execution models. Whilst overpromising organisations need to be cognisant of growth across roles while caring for personal development.

Quality of life key: For the talent pool today priorities of life have changed. For them, while money and careers are important, there is a significant focus on the quality of life. The new motto today is to do more of the things you love and less of the things you don't.

People follow people: Today's pool today seeks inspirations from leaders and peers to create a strong coach-student or mentor-mentee relationship at workplaces. Therefore, organisations need to focus on creating inspirational leadership which can create impactful careers.

However, there is nothing like ownership success and most successful CEOs have served a substantial amount of time in either their company or industry. They have often reaped the benefits of the powered longevity and compounding. These are some learnings from successful CEOs and when they did right in their careers.

Create an impact: It is important to focus on driving impactful results and conversations. On creating impact and building domain expertise; monetary results are bound to follow as a by-product.

Be centre pre-occupied: Move away from being transactional. Treat workplaces today as your extended personal domains. Can you imagine the power of organisations if every employee thought of their role with a promoter lens? What as organisations invest in the intrinsic, it is also fair for talent to go beyond and deliver in true spirit.

Culture first: Talent needs to contribute to creating a work culture that is engaging and empowering. They need to build personal connections within teams and set the right examples.

Seek investor: While building long-term careers, one also needs to be cognisant of personal development goals. Seeking guidance from a mentor will help in giving direction to your career and accomplishing personal objectives.

Staying relevant is key: Roles that existed a few years ago might not be relevant today. New career options have now opened, forcing talent to re-imagine and re-invent to stay relevant. Commit yourself to an organisation or an industry which is on a growth mode and constantly innovating to stay ahead of the curve.
